Issues in women's health, and Black women's health in particular, have become a public health crisis. Rates of maternal morbidity and mortality (MMM) are high in the United States. The incidence of severe maternal morbidity (SMM) was 166% higher for U.S. Black women than White women from 2012 to 2015. To help mitigate SMM, the Institutes of Health: Black women and American Indian/Alaska Native (AI/AN) women have rates of maternal mortality that are about two to three times higher than White and Hispanic women.

In order to dramatically reduce avoidable incidents of MMM, and promote safe pregnancy and childbirth for all women, the biomedical community needs to better uncover the root causes of MMM and find best practices and policies to address it in the U.S.

Black Mamas Matter Alliance is sponsoring the third annual Black Maternal Health Week from April 11 - 17 to raise awareness of the problem; enrich the dialogue surrounding Black maternal health; promote solutions, policies, and research; and increase community involvement.

Social determinants of health (SDOH) adversely affect pregnant women. SDOH influence root causes of persistent MMM disparities: environmental stressors, access to care and adequate nutrients, provider-held implicit biases, and other factors.

The good news is, there are potential solutions: changes to practice and policy - and awareness. Learn more about Black Maternal Health at <https://blackmamasmatter.org> or contact The San Diego County Black Infant Health (BIH), located at 286 Euclid Avenue, Suite 308, San Diego, CA 92114. “Much of the current research on MMM focuses on the medical cause of death—such as cardiovascular conditions, hypertension, hemorrhages, and thromboembolism—but not the larger environmental context. Thus, little research exists examining the root causes of the racial disparities in maternal health in the United States,” says Samia Noursi, Ph.D., ORWH's Associate Director for Science Policy, Planning, and Analysis.

DEFER STUDENT LOAN PAYMENTS

Federal student loan payments can be paused via deferment and forbearance. Deferment is tied to events like losing your job or undergoing cancer treatment. If you're eligible, this option can keep payments at $0.

For example, an unemployment deferment may be possible if you work fewer than 30 hours per week. If your hours were cut, but your household's earnings are too high for an income-driven plan, deferment may make sense. The government also covers all the accruing interest on subsidized loans during deferment. Deferment is often available for up to three years, but you have to reapply periodically.

For an unemployment deferment, the duration is every six months.

PLACE LOANS IN FORBEARANCE

Payments are currently suspended interest-free via a special administrative forbearance. When that break ends, your servicer can grant you a discretionary forbearance, potentially without paperwork. But besides no bills, that type of forbearance offers few benefits.

“Forbearance is a last resort,” Mayotte says. “It's either that or you're going to go delinquent or default.”

GETTING READY

The most important thing to do now is understand your options. Do the following:

- CHECK INFO ONLINE. Log on to your servicer's website to check your contact information and payment amount. If you're not sure who your servicer is, visit the Federal Student Aid website. Mayotte says to beware of companies reaching out and offering help for a fee; your servicer will never charge you.

- GATHER PAPERWORK. Applications can require documentation like pay stubs, which Buchanan says must be from the past three or four months when you submit your forms. If you applied now, you'd likely have to do so again with more current information. But you can get a head start by figuring out what you'll need and filling out what you can.
- SET A REMINDER. With payments set to resume in October, plan to submit your requests over the summer.

“If you wait until the day before your due date in the month when 30 million people are going into repayment,” Buchanan says, “call times are going to be long.”
