Mid-Year Money Reset: Why Now Is The Time To Revisit Your Budget

By Aaron Allen
The Seattle Medium

If the financial goals you set in January have been derailed by rising grocery prices, higher utility bills or unexpected expenses, financial experts say now, not next January, is the time to regroup.

With inflation continuing to strain household budgets and the cost of everyday necessities remaining high, financial educators are encouraging people to treat the middle of the year as an opportunity to reassess their spending, adjust their goals and build healthier financial habits without the guilt that often comes with abandoned New Year's resolutions.

“Shifting or changing a financial goal in July is actually a sign of smart financial adaptation, not a setback,” said Tierra Bonds, community financial education specialist at Verity Credit Union. “The reality is life changes, and our financial plans have to change with it.”

Financial educators say many households are confronting an important reality: a budget that no longer works is not necessarily the result of poor planning or a lack of discipline. Rising living costs have changed the financial equation for many families, making a mid-year adjustment a practical response rather than a sign of failure.

Instead of viewing those changes as personal setbacks, Bonds encourages people to see them as an opportunity to make intentional adjustments.

“I think the idea behind the mid-year reset is giving us a chance to have some self-reflection and self-awareness,” said Bonds. “We often might think it starts with the budget, the spreadsheets, and the apps, but before we can even get to that, it starts with the inner reflection.”

Once people understand their spending habits, Bonds recommends making thoughtful adjustments instead of overhauling an entire budget.

She encourages families to begin by reviewing the previous 60 days of spending to determine whether their money is supporting the things that matter most. If parts of the budget are already working, she says there is no need to change them.

Another helpful strategy is separating expenses into three categories: fixed monthly bills, occasional or non-monthly expenses such as school supplies, car registration or holiday shopping, and flexible spending. Whatever remains after covering essential costs becomes the amount available for discretionary purchases, giving households a more realistic picture of how much spending flexibility they actually have.

From there, Bonds recommends making one or two manageable changes rather than attempting a complete financial overhaul.

Small adjustments, such as canceling an unused subscription, packing lunch one extra day each week or increasing an automatic savings transfer by just a few dollars, can create meaningful progress over time without disrupting a family's entire lifestyle.

Bonds also recommends setting aside 15 to 30 minutes each week for a personal or family “money date” to review recent purchases, discuss upcoming expenses and make small course corrections. Regular check-ins, she said, can help prevent financial challenges from becoming overwhelming.

Planning ahead is another important part of a successful reset. Rather than waiting until back-to-school shopping or the holiday season arrives, Bonds encourages families to estimate those costs now and begin setting aside small amounts from each paycheck.

As families prepare for the second half of the year, Bonds believes the most important adjustment is not necessarily to a budget spreadsheet but to the way people think about money and financial success.

“Don't confuse today's economy with your financial capability,” she said. “Rising costs have created challenges for almost every household, regardless of income. Instead of asking ‘What's wrong with me?’ ask ‘What's changed, and how can I respond to it?’ That shift moves us from the shame game to the strategy game.”

Olympic Flame Arrives in Senegal for Youth Games The first Olympic event to be held in Africa

By Mark Bancherau
Associated Press

The Olympic flame was welcomed by music and dancing in Senegal's capital Sept. 12, as a march by 100 women marked the countdown to the first Olympic sporting event held in Africa — the Youth Olympic Games.

More than a hundred people gathered at Dakar's Place du Souvenir Africain, a waterfront plaza overlooking the Atlantic Ocean, surrounded by portraits of prominent figures from Africa and its diaspora, to greet the flame ahead of the Youth OlympicGames next month.

The event, running from Oct. 31 to Nov. 13, will bring together about 2,700 young athletes to compete in 35 sports across Dakar and the nearby cities of Diamniadio and Saly.

The Youth Olympics, first held in Singapore in 2010, are a smaller version of the Olympic Games for athletes aged 15 to 18.

The flame was carried on Saturday by 100 Senegalese women, known as “lingeer” — a title for queens or royal women in Wolof, one of the main languages of Senegal. They included influential actors from the cultural, sports and economic sectors.

Gacirah Diagne, one of the lingeer, said the Games will inspire young people across Africa, the continent with the world's young-

International Olympic Committee President Kirsty Coventry, who is from Zimbabwe, said the Games will be a “proud moment” for Senegal and the continent.
